Visual Style

What the current posts look like

The dominant aesthetic across all 120 posts is default travel agency Canva: navy/royal blue as the brand tone, Playfair-style serif display headings in title case with mixed capitalisation, stock photos of planes and cabin interiors as full-bleed backgrounds, and phone mockups as a recurring illustrative device.

The palette has grown inconsistent. Some posts are dark (deep navy, near-black backdrops), others are flat light-blue gradients, and a few shift entirely into warm tones or red (Christmas, Holi). There is no colour discipline. The logo always appears but its placement varies — top-left, top-centre, bottom — with no fixed anchor.

Typography is scattered. Three or four type styles are in use across the series, with text size, weight, and alignment varying post to post. The "airplane window" and "phone mockup" motifs are 2019 Canva templates and date the visual instantly. The best posts are the ones with clean type on a dark, full-bleed aircraft interior photo. The weakest are the ones with 3D phone mockups, illustrated maps, or red festive clip art.

Visual problems identified:

Clip art plane PNGs

Airplane window cutout motif

3D phone mockups

Inconsistent capitalisation

Palette drift

No typographic hierarchy

Floating logos / no fixed placement

Generic Canva stock imagery

Tone of Voice

How FCN currently sounds

Most copy reads like a press release written by someone trying to sound premium. "Message us to book now" appears verbatim in over 80% of posts. It is not warm, not witty, and creates zero urgency or intrigue.

The few exceptions — "Are you smarter than the rest of the aircraft?" and "It's your usual route, just not your usual seat" — are genuinely good. They feel like the actual FCN brand voice. The issue is those posts are outnumbered 10 to 1 by corporate-formal copy like "Thank you for being a valued customer" and "Here is a glimpse of our journey so far."

FCN's audience are smart, successful Indians who respond to directness, wit, and a sense of being in-the-know. The copy should sound like a sharp friend who happens to know how to get business class at half price — not like a travel agency FAQ.

CURRENT

"Thank you for being a valued customer.
Wishing you a Merry Christmas. Message us to book now."

NEW DIRECTION

"You deserve a flat bed this Christmas. Not a middle seat. You know where to find us."

CURRENT

"Luxury travel at non-luxury prices.
Discounted first & business seats. Message us to book now."

NEW DIRECTION

"Your CA just called. The business class seat you almost booked is actually Rs 40K cheaper with us. Just saying."

Topics + Frequency

What FCN talks about (across 120 posts)

Top departure cities: Delhi (DEL) dominates, with occasional Mumbai (BOM) and Bangalore (BLR). Top routes: London, New York, Europe broadly. Secondary: Bangkok, Maldives, Dubai, Australia. Almost no posts are directed at non-Delhi users — a missed opportunity given the BOM and BLR audience size.

India-Specific Visual References

Indian brands worth studying for direction

Nicobar	@nicobar Quiet, editorial, no shouting. Clean grid, restrained serif type, generous white space. Closest to the visual register FCN should move toward.
Rare Rabbit	@rarerabbit.in Dark, masculine editorial aesthetic. High contrast, minimal type, strong photography. Confident tone without being loud — direct visual parallel to FCN.
Mokobara	@mokobara Travel-adjacent Indian brand with strong visual identity and smart conversational copy. Their audience is almost identical to FCN's.

House of Masaba	@houseofmasaba Bold typography, strong art direction, copy with personality. Good model for a premium Indian brand that sounds like a person.
Sleepy Owl Coffee	@sleepyowlcoffee Warm, witty copy that speaks to 28-40 year old urban Indians. Conversational without being try-hard. Good tone reference for captions.
Bombay Shaving Co.	@bombayshavingindia Masters of "relatable but premium" tone. Punchy copy with Indian cultural hooks, never sounds like a press release.

Sample Posts

Six posts in the new direction — typography-first, photography as texture

These are concept mockups showing the visual direction. In practice each would use a high-quality cabin interior or destination photo as the visual anchor, with type laid on top. Dark posts use deep navy; light posts use off-white/cream. Copy is in the new voice.

Recommendations

Seven things to change

01

Kill the phone mockup and airplane window motifs entirely. Replace with full-bleed, high-quality cabin photography as atmospheric texture, with type laid directly on top. Less illustrative, more editorial.

02

Lock the palette to three colours. Deep navy (#0C1F35), off-white/cream (#F5EFE0), and a single warm accent (amber or terracotta). Stop using light blue gradients, flat reds, and stock-template greens.

03

Commit to one typeface pairing and one capitalisation rule. Use a strong serif display for headlines and a clean sans for body. Always sentence case. Never ALL CAPS for headlines.

04

Retire "Message us to book now." Rotate 4-5 CTA variants: "DM us your route," "Ask us what this route actually costs," "Find out before you book elsewhere," "You know where to find us." Each one more human.

05

Double the humour and attitude posts. Currently at ~5% of output. Should be at least 20%. The "are you smarter than the rest of the aircraft?" post works because it's confident and cheeky. That energy is the actual FCN personality.

06

Create a BOM and BLR-specific post series. Almost all pricing references are DEL departures. Mumbai and Bangalore are massive feeder markets. Even alternating one in three posts to those cities would expand the addressable audience.

07

Fix the festive posts. Current festive posts feel completely disconnected from FCN — generic clip art, generic wishes. Every festive post should connect back to travel. Use the occasion as a hook for a deal or a feeling, not a corporate greeting card.
